It's that simple; if someone has these abilities, they're in the Mind Club. But once in the Mind Club, people can be characterized by the relative strength of their agency and experience. For instance, if you're primarily characterized by your propensity for rational action, then you fit into the group of thinking doers. A prime example of this group are the CEOs of big corporations; they are generally considered to be thinking doers since they wield lots of power and have engaged in
